

Extrusive (volcanic) igneous rocks form by the crystallization of magma at the surface of the Earth. They are characterized by fine-grained textures because their rapid cooling did not provide enough time for large crystals to grow.